Summer 2015's featured course:

WRA 195H - Writing: Major Topics in American Thought

This course is a hybrid, designed with five face-to-face sessions and online assignments and meetings via D2L/Zoom. Students will need access to a computer and the Internet.

Professor: Dr. Kate Fedewa

Date & Time: Wednesdays from 10:20 a.m. - 2:10 p.m. on July 6, 8, 13, 15 and August 10, 12. Students need to bring a lunch to eat during break. The August 12 class session is optional.

Course Description: This course will engage students in a conversation regarding their individual identities as writers. Specifically, the course will help students to identify and implement writing strategies appropriate for participation in a variety of communities, including academia. Imagine the world you want to live in. What can you as a writer do to make that world a reality? This course asks you to examine the power of readers and writers and the stories they share. This course challenges you to persuade, to inform, to learn, and to change. During this semester, we will consider how the ways we learn and communicate can shape our decisions and actions. We will also consider the rhetoric of contemporary American writers in order to theorize how literacy has been tied to statements of belief and calls to action in a variety of cultural communities within the United States.
